Cardano Launches Proof-of-Concept Atomic Swap for Bitcoin and Ethereum Cardano is now introducing its proof-of-concept (PoC) atomic swap service. The new service allows users to swap tokens for cardano, and vice versa, in an atomic manner. This is currently being executed on the Bitcoin blockchain. This is reported by Cardano blog post on the Ethereum blockchain today. This new service allows one to convert one cryptocurrency for another, which is called atomic swaps. An atomic swap is a method of exchanging one asset for another, which makes the exchange itself instantaneous, and prevents either part from taking place until the other is fully complete. Currently, the standard method to executing a transaction is by making a private key. However, a transaction in this way is not considered atomic in nature. Both parties must confirm the transaction before it is officially executed. A few problems with this method are that users, or nodes, do not know when the transaction will be confirmed or if it will be successful. This is also an issue with what some in the crypto community refer to as permissioned blockchains. When a block or transaction is created or confirmed, it is visible to everyone. This is not true of permissioned blockchains. As a result, many do not know if the information is valid or not, nor is it always trusted. This leads to two problems: people sometimes lose money and sometimes people lose their digital assets. This could potentially lead to large losses of money or assets, which is something many want to avoid. Solution: Atomic Swaps Atomic swaps are a solution to this problem. When the customer wishes to
